Partner
Everest Group

Everest Group Partner David A. Noble has nearly three decades of energy and private equity experience. He has spent most of his career working on strategy issues in a wide variety of situations with a broad range of international and multinational clients in the energy, natural resources, consumer goods, agriculture, construction, and industrial services industries.

David spent 12 years with McKinsey & Company, where he was responsible for negotiating and leading consulting engagements for multinational companies headquartered in the central and southern United States. David was part of the McKinsey management team that led almost a quadrupling in size of the firm's Texas office, and helped build and lead two of the largest client relationships in that office and the firm.

At FMI Corporation, David spent two years as managing director for energy investment banking. As vice president of strategy and development at Gavilon Group, David was responsible for the strategy formulation and corporate development activities for an international commodities business that was purchased by private equity investors from ConAgra Foods.

David also spent five years as a consultant to public and private energy, technology, and business and industrial services companies and investment funds.

In addition, David has worked with venture capital and equity partners organizations, where he generated and evaluated investment opportunities, negotiated financial structures and terms, and served on the boards of directors of portfolio companies.

David has an MBA from the Harvard University Graduate School of Business Administration, and a Bachelor of Science degree in electrical engineering from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.
